Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a medical needle device and, more particularly, to a medical needle device with a cap which includes a cover body and a cap body. The cover body is connected pivotally to one end of the cap body and is used to protect the cap body when the medical needle device is not in use. The cap body is movable relative to the cover body between a cover position and a needle protection position and has a movable engaging groove which causes the cover body to deflect to a needle protection position. The cap body also has two blocking pins which are disposed in the movable engaging groove and can be activated and deactivated by a signal wire. The blocking pins have different lengths and thus can be switched on/off depending on the length of the movable engaging groove. 2. Description of the Related Art The use of medical needle devices is well known in the medical arts. Medical needle devices such as hypodermic needle devices are used to inject fluids into a patient or withdraw fluid from the patient. Such needle devices include reusable needle devices and disposable needle devices. With regard to reusable needle devices, these needle devices are typically provided in two portions or segments which are assembled together to form the final needle device. One portion of the needle device is a needle cover and the other portion of the needle device is the needle body or needle hub. The needle cover is attached to the end of the needle hub to protect the needle body of the needle device. In the use of such needle devices, there exists the possibility of the needle device slipping from the patient during the injection process or as the needle device is being removed from the patient, thereby increasing the possibility of injury to either the healthcare provider or the patient. Because reusable needle devices can be reused over and over, the possibility of injury is further increased by the fact that healthcare providers must exchange or sterilize the needle devices between patients. One known solution to the potential problem of reuse of a needle device is to provide a disposable needle device. Disposable needle devices are typically made out of only two pieces, namely, the needle cover and the needle body. Thus, the chance of the needle device slipping from the patient while the needle device is in use is substantially reduced. One known disposable needle device includes a cap and a needle body.
