An original approach for the pharmacokinetic evaluation of insulin autoantibody kinetics. Insulin autoantibody (IAA) may cause endogenous insulinopenia by continuous formation and loss of biologically active antibody leading to hyperglycemia. The latter is often only gradually noticed and, in some cases, may be associated with severe and fatal diabetic ketoacidosis. In the present study we propose an original approach for determining the kinetics of IAA in type 1 diabetes as this information may improve our understanding of IAA pathophysiology. Retrospective analysis of a cohort of 8 patients with IAA was performed. The monoclonal IAA-specific radioimmunoassay was used to determine IAA kinetics. All patients (median age 26.5 years) were treated with insulin at the time of IAA evaluation. Eight patients with

IAA (0.75 +/- 0.32 mg/l) were followed (median 28 days) and their IAA kinetics were evaluated by three different methods. The IAA half-life was estimated using a recently described method based on a biexponential equation. The IAA mass lost from the serum using a previously published method was also estimated. The glycosylated hemoglobin and plasma glucose were determined at regular time intervals and a linear regression analysis was performed. From the three different methods the mean IAA half-life was 3.7 +/- 1.6 days. IAA half-life was negatively correlated with glycosylated hemoglobin A1c ( $r=-0.88$ ;  $p<0.05$ ). The median IAA half-
