The purpose of this study is to determine the failure rates of conservative treatment in isolated syndesmotc injuries of the ankle and the role of surgical reconstruction in this group of patients. All patients with isolated syndesmotc injuries of the ankle treated by a single surgeon between 1980 and 1992 were reviewed. Ankle fractures were excluded. All patients received non-weightbearing cast immobilization for 4-8 weeks. Non-weightbearing cast immobilization was continued until the patient regained at least 90 degrees of motion on examination. If the patient failed non-weightbearing cast immobilization, the indication for surgery was discussed with the patient. This study examined the success of non-weightbearing cast immobilization in 128 ankles in 118 patients who were treated for acute isolated syndesmotc injuries of the ankle. Mean follow-up was 4.9 years. Of the 125 ankles with satisfactory results after non-weightbearing cast immobilization and medical management, only 2 (2%) had signs and symptoms of lateral ankle instability. Both patients were treated with surgery. Two other patients subsequently underwent syndesmotc reduction. The failure rate of non-weightbearing cast immobilization in isolated syndesmotc injuries of the ankle is less than 1%. In patients who fail non-weightbearing cast immobilization, the failure rate was 8%. If patients with isolated syndesmotc injuries of the ankle are able to tolerate non-weightbearing cast immobilization, there is a low risk for lateral ankle instability even in the presence of lateral malleolar fractures. In patients with lateral malleolar fracture, a high failure rate of non-weightbearing cast immobilization suggests a need for surgical fixation.Oxid 648931e174
