For the first time, internal-combustion engines have been used to produce hydrocarbons from water and syngas. Larkin et al. [2] report on work in which a Fischer-Tropsch synthesis process was used to produce hydrocarbons from syngas and water. They note that in most Fischer-Tropsch reactions, a system gas is supplied to a synthesis reactor containing a catalyst and water to form and stabilise catalyst aggregates and to supply heat for the reaction. Their system, by contrast, uses only the catalyst and water as the source of hydrogen needed in the synthesis reaction; no system gas is supplied. These authors chose to conduct their work in a laboratory reactor in order to produce small quantities of liquids under laboratory conditions; the goal was not to scale up the process for the production of, say, jet fuel or gasoline. They claim that they can produce 1% - 5% of the organic material that could be produced from petroleum by Fischer-Tropsch synthesis. Larkin et al. [2] suggest that the Fischer-Tropsch process may be particularly suitable for gasifying coal by itself without the need for a large-scale steam-reforming reactor. They note that the traditional view of
