The Dragonfly will be released this autumn priced at £449.99, according to retailer Sjtech. It comes with Intel's Core i7 processor, Nvidia graphics card and it is possible to connect a mouse or monitor via HDMI. It will be available with a choice of 11 different system configurations ranging from 3GB to 32GB of RAM and a 1TB hard disk drive, according to Mr Waugh. Image caption The touchscreen panel can be used to play games, browse the internet or surf social media "The idea of a PC with a touchscreen was quite a wild notion," said Mr Waugh, who added that the device is not aimed at gamers who mainly use their PC for everyday tasks like browsing the internet or watching movies. "We're targeting one particular audience, those of us who use our PC to play games," he told the BBC. "There are so many benefits to this device - you can go off on holidays with it as your only computer, or use it on your own in your room," he said. The Dragonfly will be available with three screens, including a 24in touchscreen panel on the base, a range of discrete gaming keyboards and mice, and up to 8 USB ports. For example, there is a "DirectX GameStream" feature that allows gamers to use an existing Windows 10 PC as a remote server for uploading and downloading games to a Dragonfly. The PC is also able to connect directly to external displays, phones or cameras, and will provide access to the new Google Photos and Google Play Movies & TV services. Ms Waugh, who will be managing the UK launch for Dragonfly's manufacturer, Seagate, described the gaming PC as an "untapped market" and the "new frontier".
